GOSPEL REFLECTION.

As Jesus hangs upon the Cross, he is surrounded by the crowd and their jeering leaders.

The language is that of anger and disappointment. Some of them might have had hopes that Jesus would be the Chosen One who would free them from the Romans. Others might have been upset by his clear teaching that the way of the Chosen One was not a political movement, aiming for peace in this world. In both cases they are stuck in the past. Once they had kings. Once they had been an independent people. A king should have the power to save himself as well as others. So, in their minds, how could this man claim to be King? As often in the Gospel, the truth lies elsewhere. Jesus calls for vision that goes beyond the usual way of thinking. So many of his detractors want Jesus to make their lives easy, to heal their ills and free them from oppression. There is the difference between them and the criminal who prays for Jesus' forgiveness. He clearly understands his own self. He is a criminal who is being justly punished for what he has done, and he accepts his fate. But he still has hope. Through reconciliation and through in Jesus he might yet be saved. In his response Jesus recognizes his faith with the promise that he is already reconciled. He is already in the Kingdom of God.

As we celebrate this wonderful feast of Christ the King, let us pray that we may like the good thief in the way we open ourselves up to the love and mercy of God. Let us remember the beautiful prayer from one of the Stations of the Cross, "Lord, help me to understand that no sin of mine is greater than your love for me."
